

Made In Tibet

Ever hear of the Great Evil Tulpa Manifestation of March 2017? No? Well, thank those little spinning things that your kids love for that. The term “Made in China” covers any number of origin points; in this case, it covers a “factory” just outside of Lhasa that “used” to be a monastery.

Not that the Chinese government was thrilled that the Tibetan prayer wheels -- sorry, “fidget spinners” -- went into global distribution. After all, they were planning to just let the upcoming demonic outbreaks happen. Alas, an official lack of belief in the supernatural makes fighting supernatural guerrilla wars, ah, problematical.
