

The Caramelizator

This handy-dandy device caramelizes onions. To operate, simply fill the hopper at the front of the Caramelizator with chopped onions, pull the trigger -- well, yes, it has a trigger. Well, sure, that does make it look like a gun. OK, fine, the entire thing looks like a 1950s movie ray gun with a big ball on one end. But the ball is there just to hold the onions. And before you ask: good luck trying to yank that sucker off.

And even if you could get the ball off, what's the point? The Caramelizator is such a low-power item it runs on batteries. It can't be plugged into a wall -- YOU MUST ABSOLUTELY NOT ADAPT IT TO LET IT BE PLUGGED IT INTO A WALL, LEST IT VIOLATE YOUR WARRANTY -- so if you pull off the ball all you'll have then is a defective, broken Caramelizator. Although the odd blue light that you can now see coming from inside the device might at least prove interesting. And... oddly tanning.

But no matter. Back to using the Caramelizator. Put in your chopped onion, pull the trigger, and voila! Instant caramelized onions. These are perfect, too. And the magic happens in seconds! No wonder that the Caramelizators are flying off of the shelves. At this rate, virtually every household in the onion-eating world will have a Caramelizator by next year. Already the restaurant industry has a Jumbo Caramelizator in the kitchen. Those suckers can do entire trays in seconds, thanks to an ingenious belt-fed system, and it's still man-portable! Barely, sure.

Anyway, this is definitely a winner from upcoming manufacturing powerhouse Enlightentech. They're pumping out these Caramelizators like crazy, as well as Micro-GPS units ("Accuracy to 1 inch or your money back!"), Interlok(™) Phones ("Lock together your lives!") and their Kinetigel(™) line of outdoor gear ("Raindrops keep bouncing off your head!"). And Enlightentech keeps saying that the best is yet to come -- or, as their motto says: "Keep Watching the Skies!"
