“It’s a framework for a mana protection field,” the armorer told me. “The wires on the harness distributes the field evenly over the entire surface, letting it dissipate or deflect any energy impacts. Oh, and it maintains a comfortable temperature, too. The lattice itself is practically indestructible, so we can make the wires thin.”

I looked the lattice over. ‘Thin’ was one word. ‘Scandalous’ was another. “Doesn’t leave much to the imagination,” I noted.

“The stuff’s expensive,” the armorer explained. “We save lots of weight this way. Plus, it’s sexy as hell.”

She grinned at my double-take. “Well, it is.”
